REACH SAYS PHILADELPHIA DEMANDS CLEAN BASEBALL.

Favors an Eight-Club League Composed of the Best Players Obtainable.

A. J. Reach, who, with Colonel John I. Rogers, furnishes the lumbering Quaker City with wide-awake baseball, was in this city yesterday on private business.

Contrary to his usual modest and retiring disposition, Mr. Reach was ready and willing to talk on the baseball situation when approached by a Journal representative.

"Yes," Mr. Reach replied, when asked whether he would ventilate his ideas on the momentous questions now agitating the national game, "I was sadly and maliciously misquoted in the West recently and would like the Journal to put me right."

"I want you to say first that no one is more pleased than I that Mr. Freedman has decided to get back into the game again and to place the New York Club in the fore in baseball. It will do the game an immense amount of good. In fact, it may be the salvation of the game."

"I saw the famous Journal interview with Mr. Freedman, and I can say that I am heartily in favor of all that Mr. Freedman proposes in the way of purifying the sport."

"I want the Philadelphia Club want a reduction of the National League to eight clubs, and we also desire the abolishment of syndicate baseball. We also want to see the game played as sportsmen should play it—no more rowdyism, no more browbeating of umpires—nothing, in fact, that can lower the sport in the estimation of the best class of its patrons."

"The Philadelphia Club wants the sport made clean, and we are in any scheme to make it so."

In regard to the now famous "Freedman combination," as exclusively published in the Journal, composed of Messrs. Brush, Sodas, Rogers, Kerr and Freedman, which is expected to make all these reforms, Mr. Reach said:

"While there may not have been any such actual combination formed as yet, still there is no doubt that there has been an understanding arrived at between them to do all they can to eliminate all those distasteful features which have been such a detriment to the game in the past."

"Mr. Freedman has gone about the business in the right way," continued Mr. Reach, "and with the Giants a strong team the game throughout the whole country will take on a boom that will give us all renewed interest and sure prosperity."

"I suppose you have the pennant already won for next year?" he was asked.

"Well, pretty nearly, but I am not predicting. It's too early," replied Mr. Reach, "but six things up here and everything will be merry."

As Mr. Reach is Colonel John I. Rogers's partner, he no doubt voices the latter's sentiments to the letter, and consequently the only doubtful one in the famous "combination" can now be said to be "in line."
